It's been years since I've used Lightroom for slideshows. As a designer, I pretty much use Corel's PowerDirector for that task. The software is heavy, very feature-rich, and very expensive. Lightroom is much lighter weight, and I've been impressed by its speed and ability to run on older equipment such as an old Compaq single-core 1 GHz Pentium 4 laptop that I have in my basement. However, it's not quite there yet when it comes to Exporting slideshows. So, Lightroom Turbo is the answer for now. However, I think it's only a matter of time before Lightroom is bundled with PowerDirector. On my iMac running OS10.6.8 and all the latest updates, Lightroom 5 (esp. the new Smart Previews feature which is wonderful!) can import images (and videos) at about half the speed of Lightroom 4.3. It actually seems to have improved the performance even further since then. Besides that, however, I don't feel that much of a performance hit just to import my Large/Large 30MP images and videos. This is not to say that Lightroom 5 is deficient in that regard. I just feel that some of the changes that have been made to the import of images and videos Compare Files: (1) better sorting options; (2) more specific handling of duplicate files; (3) handling of multiple image formats. Overall, though it definitely takes slightly more time to import these images, I think they are worth the extra effort and potential downtime. My camera is one of the newer generation of the Finepix A series, and Lightroom 4 on my iMac crashed just a few times. Lightroom 5 crashed a few more times, but with no loss of data, and on one occasion, it froze completely for a few seconds and I had to force quit the app. I ran my Import new images stage via the Magic Wand or the Auto Selection in new image mode, and then went to the Image Preview & Tagging stage for the Smart Previews. I saw that there were newer files that could be imported first, which I did. I like to load up my image collection and fast-forward to a couple of thousand new images being imported and checked out to see if there were any images I forgot to tag. It was all straightforward.
